Congo Michael Crichton

Congo is a 1980 science fiction novel by Michael Crichton, the fifth under his own name and the fifteenth overall. The novel centers on an expedition searching for diamonds and investigating the mysterious deaths of a previous expedition in the dense tropical rainforest of the Congo. Crichton calls Congo a lost world novel in the tradition founded by Henry Rider Haggard's King Solomon's Mines, featuring the mines of that work's title.

I've been a fan of Congo since I was a kid, and even though the movie gets a lot of hate I find it very entertaining. I admire Michael Crichton as a writer, his high-concept ideas often make for an entertaining read, even if he lacks the finesse to give his work more literary merit. Congo is absolutely no exception to
